ABSTRACT
This paper describes the optical properties of spectrally selective materials. The concept of spectral selectivity of solar radiation is discussed with reference to its application in architecture and photothermal uses. A brief account of spectrally selective materials being investigated presently is also given.